Mount Pavin in the Chaine des Puys mountain range in present-day southern France erupted in 4040BC.

Do you long for the good old days? How old? Fifty years ago, 500 years ago, 2000 years ago? Can you imagine how much has changed in the past 6000 years? Well, hold on to your book cover, you are about to find out.

This is the adventures of a newly mated couple living a hunter-gatherer life. Because of the eruption, they are forced to find a "new home, by the river's edge". The couple have two sons, but the brothers split and clash as they struggle with their father's decision to change from hunter-gatherer to farmer.

About the Book

Author David Wm. Allman translates the technical jargon in scientific journals to create a believable portrayal of life 6000 years ago in what would become southern France. Acorns to Wheat (232 pp., $11.99) is filled with the suspense and drama of a family living in an ancient world.

Acorns to Wheat is the story of fictional lives in the real world of 4000BC. These were the first farmers. Allman goes beyond the archaeology to tell the story of lives lived at the dawn of cultures. Flesh has been restored to bones. Before the Romans, the Greeks or the Gauls, there were the Chasseen. This is more than fierce gods, dry bones and broken pottery. Look BEYOND the research and feel the people come alive.

Acorns to Wheat is the culmination of years of studying a little known culture in southern France - the Chasseen. Archaeological digs of their sites show how they lived, their tools and burial customs. Allman's book is a creation of life stories based on factual adventures.

About the Author

David started his book after reading a newspaper headline about the last volcanic eruption in France in 4040BC. His first thought was, how do they know the year? Months past and other questions rumbled through his mind. Could someone have witnessed that eruption? A little internet investigating confirmed it. The next question, who?, took five years of research. Irritated, then exasperated, his wife finally persuaded David to compose stories based on his research discoveries. Life 6050 years ago turned out to be quite interesting.
